4 内容報告

This was the final workshop of the ten-year CORE university program with all together nine different research projects. For the eighth, “Changing “Families””, this was the final and closing workshop of the four-year project. Participants from Thailand, Malaysia, Indonesia, the Philippines, China and Japan participated this time. The papers were clustered around four major topics 1 Families in Transition, 2 Families in Trans-cultural situations (Legal perspectives, and inter-cultural marriages), 3 Polygamy, and 4 Reconstructing families from pre-modern to modern Thailand. There were a good number of papers from Thailand dealing with all of the themes. This provided us with a good temporal scope in which to question and determine the process by which “family” became institutionalized, following it up to more current phenomena such as mobility and trans-national marriages as well as state projects and ideologies. Then, we also had a good number of papers from other countries to provide us with a spatial scope in which to hold a comparative perspective.

Besides the members of the project, we had a good number of participants from the CSEAS community as well as outside. Members were assigned to comment on one other member's paper, and this livened the discussion.

We have a good core of papers that provide us with a sense of the historical development of institutionalization of families in the region, which involves issues of state ideology, colonization, class and ethnicity. In addition, we have a good sense of the variety of the kinds of changes taking place today, through such central issues as polygamy, migration, and transnational marriage.
